London. - Purchased from the above in 2016 by the present owner, since then private collection Germany. Catalogue raisonné: Feldman/Schellmann, no. II.265. With his series "Myths" from 1981, Andy Warhol demonstrated his profound knowledge of the society of his generation. He chose the "gods" of this time, the symbols and icons of a society in which mass consumption was becoming increasingly important and which was itself increasingly influenced by mass media and Hollywood. He thus compiled a list, not of impeccable, exemplary qualities, but one which showed a representative cross-section of the dubious, rakish, cunning, humorous and good characters, who were known and loved throughout the world from the films and series of the 1950s. These included internationally known heroes such as Mata Hari, Dracula, Superman and Santa Claus, as well as typical American characters such as Howdy Doody, Mammy, Uncle Sam, The Wicked Witch of the West - and of course Mickey Mouse could not be omitted from this list. Mickey Mouse is probably the world's most famous figure in art. On 18 November 1928 the comic book figure created by Walt Disney made his first appearance in the film "Steamboat Willie"; two years later there appeared the first comic strip and there followed a world-wide triumph which was unequalled anywhere. Numerous comic strips, films, articles of merchandise and amusement parks made Mickey Mouse into a world-famous brand. Even today, in the year of his 90th birthday, his fame is undiminished and so it is hardly surprising that he also aroused the interest of Andy Warhol. In the second half of the 20th century, the founder of Pop Art revolutionised art by examining this changed society, in a way unlike any other artist. He sought out everyday objects, events, stars and starlets which appeared in everyone's life and which had some kind of meaning for everyone. Whether it was articles of mass consumption, such as the famous Campbell's Soup tins, which were never absent from American and English store cupboards in the 1950s and 60s, or prominent figures such as Jackie Kennedy and Marilyn Monroe, in whose destiny an entire generation had participated. With consummate skill, Warhol used photos and pictures of these stars, as well as events or objects, and by employing them in his artworks and the simultaneous series, he elevated them to the status of icons, not only of his, but of our time. The incredible
