executed with outstanding liveliness, and the timberwork of the barn interior is sketched. Dr. Schnackenburg refers to the "The Washerwoman" of 1637 as a well-known comparable work from this stylistic phase, which is in the Hamburg Kunstalle (Inv.-No. HK-122). As Dr. Schnackenburg states in his report, the depiction of everyday motifs in Dutch painting also had a fundamentally allegorical significance. These works were part of everyday culture and were understood without any explicit references. The peasant woman who inspects the boy's shirt for fleas, as well as the peasant who stares into his empty beer jug, suggest that this is a representation of the five senses and, namely, the sense of sight (visus).
